

The editors of Diánoia are interested in publishing scholarly works of outstanding quality that make a clearly identifiable contribution to current research on the topic—or topics—under consideration. Diánoia publishes original works only, which can be articles, discussions, critical notes, or book reviews. Articles and discussions must make an original contribution, which can be a critical assessment of a particular philosophical view or a novel comparison between two or more of them. Book reviews can be either informative or critical. In the first case, the review must present the content of the book clearly; in the second case, the review must, in addition, comment the book's content from a critical perspective.

Authors assume responsibility for the views they express, which should never be taken to reflect the journal's own position. Diánoia has the aim of furthering philosophical discussions of the highest academic quality while respecting the diversity of points of view.

Referees receive a questionnaire with specific questions that works as a guide for evaluation. The editors appreciate the receipt of reviews within five weeks after they are requested. This allows the journal to offer a prompt response to authors. When a contribution exceeds 10 000 words (including footnotes and bibliography), the editors appreciate the receipt of reviews within seven weeks.
